Bring a dairy dish or dessert for our pot luck supper

Joseph Dorinson is a professor in the History Department at Long Island University, where he has taught since 1966. Dorinson has co-edited a book, Jackie Robinson: Race, Sports and the American Dream (1999), and has written numerous articles on a variety of subjects spanning his beloved borough of Brooklyn, black heroes, sports, politics, humor, and ethnicity. He has organized conferences at LIU on Jackie Robinson (1997), Brooklyn (1998) and Paul Robeson (1998). During baseball's first "Subway Series" since 1956, Dorinson appeared on television (CNN, Fox News, New York One); was heard on the radio (NPR, WOR); and was profiled in the New York Times discoursing on blacks, "reds," baseball, and the American experience. His book, Kvetching and Shpritzing: Jewish Humor in American Popular Culture was published by McFarland in October, 2015.
